

Aviation-Event Security 2020 HAM

REVIEW 2020

19 October 2020, Hamburg Airport

»The corona crisis works like a turbo: Many things that worked well yesterday could be outdated tomorrow - after the corona crisis. This makes it all the more important for us to decide now how to prepare our processes and structures for the take-off and the time afterwards. We must all ensure that our passengers feel completely safe at all times and that they know that flying is a safe means of transport in every respect.«

Michael Eggenschwiler, CEO Hamburg Airport

»Flying safely and healthily - that is also possible in corona times. The renewed increase in passenger numbers that we all hope for requires that passengers have full confidence in the hygiene and health protection measures at our airports. The Federal Police makes its contribution to this through constant evaluation and adaptation of the security processes and very close cooperation with airports, airlines and security service providers.«

Markus Bierschenk, Head of Aviation Security Division, Federal Police Headquarters

»Innovation is the key - in particular, in times of tremendous technological and social change. The 'Smart Borders Package' of the European Union stands for an innovative approach by means of biometrics and new technology. There is a need to identify common strategies and solutions in terms of security and facilitation. A platform like the Aviation-Event creates an excellent occasion to do partnering and building trust within the Civil Aviation community. This is the way to go forward in order to shape the future via trustful and concerted action.«

Dr. Norbert Reez, Head of Project Group Smart Borders, Federal Police

»As the Covid-19 crisis continues, uncoordinated policies across Europe and beyond will undoubtedly lead to the destruction of jobs and of both economic and social opportunities. The harmonization of measures, including widespread testing, and further government support are critical for aviation's survival.«

Rafael Schwartzman, Regional Vice President, IATA Europe

»COVID-19 has changed expectations of safety and security. For the aviation industry, meeting these expectations will be critical to allow operations to function as efficiently and safely as possible. We are ready to partner with airports to help restore both passenger and employee confidence through the equipment we supply, the partners we work with and the safety measures we can help put in place. This includes preventative measures such as cleaning (disinfection) of equipment, minimizing contact between travelers and staff and in the longer term the introduction of new technologies such as biometrics to help reduce the risks further. The Aviation-Event here in Hamburg provides a great platform to present and discuss the various options to reduce the touchpoints along the passenger journey.«

Oktavian Halm, Product Manager Aviation Digital, Smiths Detection

»What the tourism industry, and the aviation industry in particular, is experiencing today is an unprecedented disaster. We have to pull together now and make our voices heard in order to build further awareness what airlines and airports are going through. Eventually Covid-19 will pass. In the meantime we have to make the best of this situation and build further resilience, join forces, innovate our businesses and adapt to new customer travel behavior, which undoubtedly will occur. Events like these are essential to exchange views on what is to come and how to overcome the challenges.«

Peter Oncken, Managing Partner, Intro Aviation

»Aviation-Event is very proud and delighted to announce that under difficult circumstances due to COVID-19, we have overcome all odds and made this „Aviation-Event Security 2020 Hamburg“ feasible for all of us. We are very pleased with the support given by Rafael Schwartzman, Regional Vice President, IATA for showing keen interest in joining the event and being a part of the event virtually and sharing vivid details and observations on how things have been shaping during this current times in the Aviation industry. Over 60 leader of the industry came together at Hamburg Airport to discuss the latest aviation security issues: live, face-to-face, networking, respecting all current location regulations.«

Marcel Riwalsky, Founder and Organiser Aviation-Event
